Potential locations include:

Rats may gain access through openings around:

- Damaged screens
- Cracks and gaps

Outdoor conditions can also influence rodent activity around buildings.

Identifying potential entry points is an important part of long-term rat control.

Professional Rat Extermination

A professional rat exterminator may inspect the property for evidence of rodent activity and conditions that could support an infestation.

A typical process may involve:

1. Property Inspection

The technician looks for droppings, nesting material, gnaw marks, entry points, and other evidence.

2. Activity Assessment

The provider determines where rats may be entering, traveling, nesting, or feeding.

3. Control Strategy

Appropriate rodent-control methods are selected based on the property and circumstances.

4. Entry-Point Assessment

Potential openings that allow rats to enter may be identified for exclusion or repair.

How can I tell if I have rats or mice?

Can rats damage a house?

Rats can chew materials and may damage wiring, insulation, stored items, and other property components. Professional assessment can help identify the extent of activity.

Can rats come back after extermination?

They can return if new rodents gain access to the property. Addressing potential entry points and conditions that attract rodents can help reduce recurring activity.

How long does rat control take?

The timeframe depends on the severity of the activity, property conditions, control approach, and whether follow-up service is necessary.

Can I remove rats myself?

Some homeowners use DIY rodent-control methods, but persistent or significant activity may require professional assessment, particularly when rodents are entering occupied areas.

Should I call an exterminator if I only see one rat?
